James Miller started carving at age 11 under the guidance of a supportive Community Education carving group. The members of this group introduced him to the Scandinavian flat-plane style, which sparked his ever-expanding interest in Scandinavian culture as a whole. This interest, and the support of mentors, family, and friends, has led him to become the youngest Vesterheim Gold Medalist woodworker, teach several classes, and demonstrate in numerous small-town events. In 2010, James' work appeared in Woodcarving Illustrated for the first time as part of the Best Carving Design Contest. Several years later, through the encouragement of Harley Refsal, he submitted an article to Woodcarving Illustrated's 5th Whittling edition. Since then, he has written several articles for the magazine, and in 2018, he traveled to Norway to meet with talented craftsmen and learn their techniques.

Jaeheon Yun is a puzzle designer based in South Korea. He graduated from Seowon University with a degree in Industrial Design in 2004; then, just before his first child was born in 2011, he bought a scroll saw and began making wooden toys. He now adapts the idea of the classic jigsaw puzzle into cute and stylized animal pieces that interact with each other to create larger animal "family" puzzles. Jaeheon often designs his animal puzzle pieces after forms found in Japanese toys. His son, Jimin, often "tests" out his puzzles in Jaeheon's two-room workshop, and Jaeheon hopes to teach him the scroll saw someday. Jaeheon's small business, called Namunolie (a combination of two Korean words meaning "tree" and "play"), can be found on Etsy.

16 Metalworking Workshop Projects for Home Machinists

Practical & Useful Ideas for the Small Shop
 HAROLD HALL

Create useful and essential items that can't be purchased commercially, from an auxiliary workbench and tap holders to distance and height gauges, a lathe backstop, faceplate clamps, and so much more. 16 Metalworking Workshop Projects for Home Machinists contains a collection of unique projects based on the author's most popular articles that have been published in Model Engineer's Workshop magazine. Every project is intended to make workshop tasks easier once the item is completed and ready for use.

Chapter 5

Distance Gauges

The conventional way of establishing a distance using gauges is to use Slip Gauges. These though cover a much wider range than will normally be required in the home workshop, up to a few hundred millimetres depending on how many are stacked together. Of even greater importance, is that they will be much more accurate than will be necessary, typically within 0.0025mm (0.0001in). This all results in an expensive piece of kit.

Like the slip gauges, the distance gauges in this chapter, Photo 1, are intended to be stacked and with this done a range of up to 50 mm is possible, again depending on the number of gauges in the stack. Of course you could make longer gauges than I suggest to increase the range. You will not of course be able to produce gauges to the accuracy of the commercial items and my suggestion is to aim to be within  $\pm 0.05 - 0.0025\text{mm}$  (0.001in). Even this level of accuracy will need particular care to achieve.

Working to such tolerances on a lathe is not easy with two aspects being problematical. First, it will need very fine cuts to be taken to finally bring the part to dimension. This not being easy with the leadcrew being calibrated in 0.025 mm

(0.001in) increments when cuts of 0.001 mm (0.0004in) are likely to be required. When turning outside diameters to precise dimensions it is common practice to set the top slide to an angle of 6°. With this done, traversing the top slide by 0.025 mm will increase the depth of cut by only 0.0025 mm, a ratio of 10:1. For even greater sensitivity, an angle of 0.6° will give a nominal ratio of 100:1. However, whilst the top slide's calibration for angles will suffice for 6°, 0.6° will need to be set up differently, more about that later.

Having now got a method of setting a fine depth of cut a suitable tool will be required. It should be obvious that you cannot take a cut 0.001 mm deep if the tool is slightly blunt and has a radius of 0.002mm on its cutting edge, it will only rub. Only a freshly honed high speed steel tool can provide such a fine edge. The material used for tipped tools cannot, which in any case are often deliberately supplied slightly radiused to provide strength at the cutting edge.

The gauges in this chapter though require accuracy in terms of length rather than diameter and for this the top slide needs to be set with an angle of just 0.6° between it and the cross slide. To do this, with a DTI mounted on the top slide and reading off the faceplate, adjust the angle so that a variation of 0.5 mm occurs on the indicator reading whilst the top slide is traversed 50mm.

You may have to make temporary arrangements for your top slide to be set at this angle. For my Myford series seven the operating handle folded the cross slide and had to be replaced with a small round knob. Incidentally, using a between-centres test bar rather than the topslide,

Photo 2 Machining the second face of the distance gauge. A similar method can be used to set the top slide at 0.6° to the lathe's axis.

Manufacture

With a length of material in the three jaw drill though 6 mm and part off a little longer than the length of the gauge being made. Roughed making at least two of each size. Make a parallel mandrel as per SK1 and use this to hold each gauge in turn for finishing to length. With the first gauge fitted and using a left-hand knife tool face the surface next to the chuck. Do not remove but now with a right hand knife tool faced, machine the other side precisely to the dimension required Photo 2. To do this, use the cross slide, but the angled top slide to place on the required depth of cut. You will increase the depth of cut on one side by feeding the top slide in and feeding it out will increase the cut for the other side. The different length tubes
